1- Late first-time mothers question the patriarchal heterodesignated discourse on maternity. The become subjects with agency who freely decide when and how to become mothers.

2- The profile of our informants is, generally, women with a high qualifications and professional women. Many of them have high positions in companies.

3- These women are highly thought of in the professional sphere, something which has empowered them and helped them to make the decision to become late first-time mothers.

4- Motherhood, far from perturbing their lives, further empowers them. Nevertheless, this new role also forces them to reorganize their lives, their times, and their priorities.

5- These women question prejudices regarding “late” first-time mothers, encouraging, through their attitudes, the use progresses in gynecology and in assisted reproductive technologies. That is, they are aware of and use these new technologies.
6- This motherhood, even though it is strongly desired, cannot be separated from the vital conjunctures of each subject.
